Recovery for the few –
the truth about pay in
Northern Ireland

Britain needs a pay rise
It is in the electoral interest of the Prime Minister and his Chancellor, George Osborne, and their allies in the media to promote the idea that wages are now higher than inflation but as the Guardian’s Economic Editor, Larry Elliott, made clear in a recent analysis of the Office of National Statistics (ONS) and Consumer Price Index (CPI) figures, wages over the past decade have been historically low. And even now, as Larry Elliott wrote it is questionable whether wages are actually rising; “The government’s measure of average earnings is a mean. If pay increases are skewed to those on the better-paid jobs, the mean can increase while most workers’ pay increases less quickly than inflation. Average earnings excluding bonuses (which tend to go to those on higher incomes) are rising by 1.3% a year, which is still below the official inflation rate of 1.6%”.

Osborne the political tactician delivers a budget for the few
When the Chancellor, George Osborne, delivered his 2014 Budget it wasn’t Osborne the economic strategist, it was Osborne the political tactician. And the date he had in mind was June 15th 2015. The person he set out to please was the voter who tends to vote - the older voter. Having wooed them, he did what this Chancellor and this Coalition Government has always done and based his Budget on the principle of ‘to those that have shall be given’. If you are one of the top one per cent or earn £125,000 or more you will be able to make the most of the ISA changes that he brought in with the merging of cash and stocks, and the limit for tax-free savings raised to £15,000. But far too many of us have seen real pay cuts, as wages fail to keep up with household bills rising. Most of us haven’t got any spare cash to save.

Who the budget left out
There were plenty of omissions in his Budget. He had nothing to say about our young people. (In a speech lasting an hour there was only one reference to apprentices and young people). It had nothing to say about people on zero hours, low pay or part time workers who would rather have a full time job, so nothing at all for the working poor.

So what has really happened to our members’ wages?
When we look behind the spin and the rhetoric at what has really happened to ordinary workers’ wages then it is no wonder we don’t feel any benefit from the so-called recovery. Recent YouGov polling found that only 20% think their household financial situation will get better over the next 2 months: even among Tory voters the figure only rises to 33%. There has been a huge jump in self-employment, an increase in part-time and temporary working, and in the number taking second jobs. And where jobs are being created they tend to be in low paying sectors. In short, we are not getting the decent jobs with decent wages that people are crying out for.
Northern Ireland

- In NI the middle hourly wage has gone up by 47p in 3 years.
- In 2010 it was £9.78 and now it is £10.25.
- The top 10% of earners received £21.67 an hour or more in 2010; in 2013 they received £22.56 an hour.
- The bottom quarter of those in NI earned just £7.34 in 2010 and £7.46 in 2013.
- In 2013 half of workers living in NI earned £19,293 a year; in 2010 it was £18,142.

Cameron and Osborne’s Britain

Len McCluskey, General Secretary of Unite responding to this research into wage levels since the Conservatives and Liberal Democrats formed the Coalition Government said;

“Workers’ wages have been suffering their longest slump since the 1930s, falling in real terms year on year throughout the Tory term of office. Britain urgently needs a pay rise, and it won’t get one from a government that always puts the rich first”.
